power. So if you just scan this amendment, you'll see many instances where I've stricken words like "maximum", inserted in its place "reasonable", and those kind of amendments are not too difficult to understand. There was another provision that said if a particular power of the agency can be given a broad interpretation or a narrow, it should be given a broad interpretation. I struck that. By this being a model bill, they defined things which we don't have to define in Nebraska. They defined state. State, according to them, means the state of Nebraska and its duly constituted government. Well, we pretty much know what state means, so I struck that. County has only one meaning in Nebraska, so I struck that definition. They gave a too elaborate definition for city and village. I think all we'd have to do is say, it's an incorporated entity, and that was enough. So many of my amendments are of that type. Some are grammatical in terms of relocating language. They would have modifiers placed in a sentence in such a location that it caused difficulty in understanding what the sentence meant, because the modifiers would apply to the wrong part of the sentence. So in some of those instances, there will be several of the same type of amendment located in several spots throughout the bill. When the bill allowed for these differing combinations to take place, their way of expressing it was not too clear. So what I did was to put language, and you can see where this would be, "counties"...oh, "two or more counties or a combination of cities and counties" instead of saying, like, two...one or more cities, one or more counties, they had it jumbled up, so I kind of smoothed that out. Some of the more substantive amendments now went to the kind of power that these agencies would have over residents. There was one part which said, if any member of a household committed certain acts away from the location of the units, the whole family could be evicted. So, if a spouse, a husband went away and got into a fight with somebody in a bar, the whole family can be evicted, although it had nothing to do with the way the people keep house, the way they conduct themselves in the unit, and I thought that was way overreaching. If somebody were found to be involved in drug-related activity, they say drug-related so they can get at anything. If a person were found to have been in possession of drugs, possession can occur if you have it in your car. So, if somebody visited you, was subsequently charged with possession of say marijuana, because they found a joint in the
